The lecture will focus on one of Modernism's underlying values, the integrity of design - drawn from history and practice. Recent emphases on surface treatments and shape-making 'integrity' is not fashionable and is aggravated by the de-skilling of architects, regulation changes and contractor preferences.

Rab Bennetts will describe how the interdependence of structure, services and fabric of a building, combined with strong links between internal and external form are increasingly important in achieving high levels of sustainability.
